My parents wanted me to pursue higher education in college, but I was uncertain about what path to take. I was intrigued by the idea, but unsure of how to proceed. I reasoned that gradual changes in my body were unlikely to occur, as my backbone had become more curved over time. I knew that studying at home alone wouldn't be as beneficial as attending college. However, the experiences I encountered there were beyond explanation. I have grown up and now face challenges that are part of everyday life. With the transition to college, I anticipate significant changes in my life.

I struggle to find the right words to explain these thoughts and feelings to my parents. There may come a day when it becomes clear that miracles won't happen for me, and in that moment, I will make decisions about my future and how to cope. Whenever I find myself resenting this life and blaming my body, a moment of prayer brings me solace. It is as if Jesus transforms my worries into joy, and I am reminded of my love for life.

Do I deserve to go to college?
